Life Stage Design: Making Your Home Fit Perfectly

As we move through our lives, our circumstances and needs change, and with that, so does what we want and need to get out of our homes. Does this mean that at every stage of your life you need a different home? No. But it does mean that periodic modifications of your home will allow it to stay as well suited to your life as possible and allow you to fully enjoy the home that you love for much longer.

Since many couples buy their homes either before they start their family or while their children are still small, they often find they need to make changes to their home as time passes by. These renovations could include adding bedrooms, enlarging a kitchen to create more room for cooking or eating, or converting an unfinished basement into a play room.

For empty nesters whose children have grown up and moved out, there are often unused rooms in the home that could be transformed into welcome new spaces. Extra bedrooms and play areas can be turned into home offices, libraries, exercise rooms, or hobby rooms.

While these changes happen in the course of most families' lives, there are other life changes that are not as easily predicted, but which also provide a great opportunity for adjusting your home to better suit your life. Perhaps a new job will necessitate working out of a home office. Perhaps your parents want to spend more time with their grandkids, and an in-law or grandparents' suite would allow that. In addition, we all develop new interests as we age, many of which can benefit from a change to our homes. Some people realize they enjoy entertaining, and would like to beautify their kitchen and add a big dining room, or a game room, perhaps with a pool table. Some people, as their lives get busier, would like to make their home into a calm oasis, and add private master suites and bathrooms.

Our lives are full of transition, and most of us probably don't want to uproot our families and move to a new house every time our life stage changes. Remodeling your home can be a great solution, allowing you to stay in the house and community that you love, while keeping your house up to date with your life.
